BROOKE'S COMET VISIBLE
IN NORTHWESTERN SKY

Newly Discovered Wanderer Among the Stars Observed by Astronomers in the Constellation Cepheus.

Brooke's comet, the newly discovered heavenly wanderer, which was discovered less than three months ago, is now visible to the naked eye. It is not a stupendous, flaming body flashing through the skies like some of its fellow-wanderers, but is distinctly visible and is receiving great attention from astronomers.

All the observatories of the country are fixing their lenses on the heavenly tramp. Last Friday night the comet was under observation by astronomers at the Naval Observatory. The observations were made through the twelve-inch glass, and the body appeared surprisingly

The comet is moving rapidly in a northwesterly direction. It is now visible in the constellation Cepheus, which at 9 o'clock in the evening is in the northeastern sky. It appears as a star of small magnitude. It is now in the best position for observation about 9 o'clock in the evening. Because of the brightness of the moon at present the visibility of the wanderer is decreased. The skies lately have kept astronomers from seeing the comet at its best. The celestial tramp is now about 4,500,000 miles from the earth. On September 17 it will be at its nearest point to the earth, about 4,000,000 miles. On October 11 it will reach its perihelion, its nearest approach to the sun.
